The Sin of Wastefulness

Thomas Edison is in Europe, enjoying the first vacation he has had in twenty years. Naturally, he sees with a clear vision and takes note of many things which escape the notice of the jaded annual tourist.

What has most aroused his interest in France is the extent to which domestic science has been developed there. He could easily see that the French people live, and live well, on about what the waste of food amounts to in this country. This is no new discovery. It has been investigated and discussed many times. But Mr. Edison's observations, coming at this time, and from such a source, are attracting attention, says the Cleveland Leader.

There can be no doubt that wastefulness is one of the causes of the cost of high living in America. It is a national sin which has only lately come to be recognized outside of the circles of scientific economists. The country relatively is new. There has been such an abundance of the things the people want, that there has been little thought of carefulness in their use. Wastefulness has become a habit. It required the efforts of some of the most forceful men of the times to arouse the country even to a realization that something must be done to conserve its forests, mineral lands and waterpower sites.

The United States, the demands of its population now approaching reasonable limits in the use of its natural resources, is beginning to have forced upon it lessons which the Old World was compelled to learn many years ago. One of these is that wastefulness is not only inexcusable on any ground but brings its natural penalty sooner or later.

Activity on the Wichita Falls Road

The following dispatch from Guthrie appeared in the Wichita Eagle. This shows that work on the Wichita Falls Route is very active, and it looks like the road is going to be built:

"The first construction on the extension northward of the Wichita Falls & Northwestern (Katy) will be from Hammond, Okla., the present terminus to Cheyenne. It is planned to have trains running into Cheyenne by January 1. The 'Katy' is furnishing money for the extension to Woodward, and is now running trains from Dallas to Hammond, using the Wichita Falls & Northwestern from Wichita Falls, Texas, to Hammond, nearly 200 miles of track. From Cheyenne the road will be constructed northward to a crossing on the Canadian river and thence to Woodward. The 'Katy's' intention, it is said, is to build ultimately to a Denver connection somewhere in Kansas."
